Barthes follows up on the school of semiotics established by Ferdinand de Saussure for whom the building blocks of semiotics are found in a dyadic model of: (1) the signified; 'the "something" which is meant by the person who uses the sign' (Barthes 1967: 43); (2) the signifier; the mediator which is used to infer the signified; and together they constitute the sign. Therein, one can infer the signified upon interacting with the signifier.

Barthes takes on "complex systems" meaning those that involve cinema or any elaborate semiotic system. He critiques Jung's archetypes by analyzing them as a set of social substratums recorded in a timeless framework. Semiology is a science that is wider than the sum total of its parts, his analysis taking it to the Syntagm system and beyond.
